

Some people prefer to travel when they are young, whereas others believe traveling at an old age is better. Which do you prefer?

Today, more people are traveling than ever before. While some argue that travelling at the late stages of life is more beneficial, I am of the opinion that this should happen at a young age.

First, travelling can bring about experience and knowledge of which a young person can take advantage later in his life. As a young person, you need to gain knowledge and experience and travelling can be a really good source for that since it provides you with firsthand experience. Exploring the world in the search of unknowns is what many renowned scientists and great authors experienced which brought them valuable benefit. Saint Exupery can be a very good case in point as his expeditions around the world and his adventures in some intact areas led him to create his masterpiece, Little prince.

Secondly, traveling often requires a great deal of energy. As being young means being more energetic, one can seize every little opportunity which presents itself during the journey. Many great tourist attractions are located in remote areas which necessitate ~~visitors~~ enough energy and physical power on the part of visitors. For instance, I can remember when I was a teenager once I made a trip with a number of my friends to a place called " Alamut Castle" in my country. While reaching the castle through a lot of stairs was a really easy task for us, a number of elderlies happened ed to find it very taxing and consequently gave up.

In conclusion, despite some advantages that traveling at an old age might have, I would argue that such an experience could be more beneficial when young as it provides them with experience and calls for energy of youth.