

Many people today use their phones for sending texts more than talking.

What are the reasons for this?

Are there more advantages than disadvantages?

Nowadays, communication through sending messages is further prevalent rather than making a phone call. I personally opine the demerits of this phenomenon exceed its merits. In this essay, I would outline the possible reasons behind this along with its negative effects.

First and foremost, texting consumes the texter less time provides the call-maker with less time consuming as by summarizing words as well as using the emojis, we are able to transfer our message which might take considerably more time than phoning lexically being transferred. As a result of today's hectic lifestyle in which people's schedule is fully occupied by full-time work, household chores and other modern citizen's citizens' responsibilities, maximum utilization of time has become dramatically important. A quick message which contains a considerable amount of information in itself make it is preferable rather than explaining all of them the gory details through a phone conversation. What is more, texting presents an opportunity to think about what we are going to say which provides us with choosing the most wisely way to reply to a message. E, especially in a situation when which calls for patience/being patient, conflicting for instance, conversation through a message could save a relationship or a work opportunity. Texting, in addition, offers us more time to consider different aspects so that it prevents us taking an immediate decision.

Though the two given privileges of typing a message over the phone call are not deniable, dire consequences might arise of from it. Misunderstanding could be considered the a profound one, causing our career and relationships to be undermined in that expressing our feeling through typed messages is not possible. It means the receiver might grasp out true intention by mistake. Besides, alienating from each other is one of the results of this way of communication as due to its silence-silent nature.

All in all, from my point of view texting might cause grave consequences some of which are irrecoverable.
