

Nowadays people can buy a large variety of household goods, more than ever before in most countries in the world. Is this a good or bad development? Give your opinion and examples.

Thanks to the white goods people are living an easier life than that of their ancestors living decades ago. While this higher standard of living is absolutely desirable to an overwhelming majority of individuals, others wholeheartedly are not happy based on reasonable grounds. The following lines turn the spotlight on this controversial topic.

That we are living in a world full of artificial attractions made by intelligent people is an indisputable fact. Gone are the days when humans had close ties with nature, and had a healthier lifestyle. In this day and age not only are we consuming the old Mother Nature's mineral resources more than what is expected to produce household appliances, but we are also destroying our planet by plenty of waste produced by used materials left from households.

Having said that, it goes without saying that not only is living without major appliances not feasible for a vast majority of people, but it also can degrade our standard of living to a certain degree. Tired-tired of the hectic pace of life, people living in metropolitan areas have no other choice than using such commodities so that they can save their time to rest or escape from their sedentary lifestyle. Only when people can leave their chores to machines, can they dedicate some of their limited time to physical activities to lead a healthy lifestyle.

To cut a long story short, I maintain that by the advent of household appliances we ~~could~~ managed to bridge the seemingly unbridgeable gap between modernity and traditional lifestyle in a way that even busy people could leave a lot of their personal chores to the machines. With the wisdom of hindsight, had we learnt how to reduce the waste and energy consumed by such ~~a~~ helpful goods, we could have drastically lessened the destruction to the environment made by usage of these gadgets.