

Many people associate money with happiness and think that the more money one has, the happier they should be. Do you agree with this statement? Give relevant examples from your own experience.

A vast majority of members of society believe in a close correlation between wealth and life satisfaction. In fact, the supporters of this idea believe the rich can enjoy their life much more than others. When it comes this notion, I argue that although well-off individuals have more choices in their lives, this does not necessarily mean they are happier than others. This short essay elaborates on this heated debate.

Though an overwhelming majority of people strongly hold the idea that affluent families are more satisfied with their life owing to their financial power, I do not agree with this notion completely. Spending too much time on work to earn more money, many an affluent individual ~~s~~ suffers from a variety of physical and mental exhaustion. Hardly a month goes by without a new scandal revealed by the media ruining the billionaires' personal lives. Perhaps this is why majority of the rich and famous start taking drugs ~~s~~ despite knowing the consequences of drug abuse.

That being said, being rich is not that much horrible. I maintain that earning money up to a certain level can provide us with a variety of facilities such as more leisure time, ~~a~~ luxurious place to live, and delicious food, hence its importance. Many enjoy spending a large amount of their handsome income ~~to on~~ charities on ~~the~~ humanitarian grounds claiming that this gives them ~~a~~ prolonged emotional pleasure. I personally believe that not only is this kind of spending to the donors' benefit, but it also is to the benefit ~~to of the~~ whole society. Hardly ~~can~~ a poor ~~person can~~ find out about the pleasures the rich experience.

By way of conclusion, I must confess ~~!~~ that although strong financial abilities can solve a wide range of plights we may encounter in our everyday life, it can plague myriad ~~s~~ of unpredictable problems if the wealth ~~does is~~ not managed wisely. Undoubtedly if the wealth is obtained from unlawful means we would say "with the wisdom of hindsight, had I known this much of wealth ~~end up would lead~~ my life into disaster, I would not have spent my life on it".
