

Some people believe that teaching music in schools is a vital part of growing up and the human experience, while others believe that teaching music in schools is a waste of time and resources.

Discuss both these views and give your own opinion.

As opposed to some people who argue that children's growth is inextricably bound up with learning music, some others s disagree and subscribe to the view that music should be discounted as a trivial matter. As far as I am concerned, there is more to education than just some common lessons and therefore music should be addressed as a key factor in the schools.

On the one hand, there are some people who are suspicious of the importance of music in children's life, supposing that placing focus on science and social-related issues, schools can effectively develop students' abilities in the areas of high priority like economy and politics. They passionately believe that music is not as paramount a factor as are routine curriculums, considering that society requires some skillfully educated individuals to contribute to the socio-economic advancement of the countries. Therefore, allocating various resources of the schools to this subject is “nothing but a waste”.

On the other hand, some regard music as an integral part of education, assuming that not addressing this highly profound matter will have taken its toll on children before long. They need to grow up both educationally and emotionally and needless to say that music plays a pivotal role in the latter one. Moreover, not only does music inspire students and lead them to think outside the box, but it also boosts creativity and improves their intellectual skills.

From my personal side, I am a strong advocate of music and consider it an inevitable part of education. With the hectic lifestyle of modern societies imposing remarkable restrictions on day to day life, music makes individuals unwind and helps them to escape into their own little world. In addition, being a universal language, music can bring different nations together and increase understanding among them. Gone are the days that a narrow-minded approach toward schools and the education system could yield a beneficial result and that is why children should be rendered exposed to learning various lifelong skills.

In conclusion, though intangible the positive effects of music may seem at first, it is worth spending time and resources to familiarize children with the charming world of music and it would be really grateful-useful if authority figures paid special attention to the ever-rising significance of music and the spiritual development of students.
