

Kids nowadays do not give enough time to helping their communities. Agree or disagree?

In general, helping society irrespective of our age or nationality is considered a vital act. We can always find some people who help their nation more than others. But in developed countries a vast majority of people even kids do care about their community. ~~By the way~~, I am of the idea that kids these days tend to help society more than before. The first reason is that technology informs ~~s kids-~~ them about helping their surroundings. Moreover, the educational system teaches ~~kids-in~~ this area and the last reason is that ~~kids-they~~ have more opportunity to help the environment than before.

To begin with, thanks to ~~technology-technological~~ developments, which has made it much easier for kids to access broad information about helping the community and reaching ~~the~~ information from on the Internet plays a key role in kids' awareness. Kids nowadays know the importance of paying attention to ~~the-associationsociety~~ especially in prosperous countries. For instance, ~~kids-those~~ who live in European countries are more likely to spend time contributing to their community than those living/who live in their under-developed counterparts/countries.

Secondly, at the present time countries invest in their educational system more than past and this could be a leading cause to kids' consciousness. Children in school learn how to assist other human beings and even the environment. Kids find out paths of serving the community in early years of their life. Iran's educational system is a compelling example of this idea. The way they teach kids how to be socially active and interact with society is not only incredible but so efficient. Kids work together in planting seeds in their school ground.

Last but not least, kids spend time helping their community more than before because they obtain information from both the Internet and school; now they need society to be open handed and encourage them to get involved in their community/association. The more opportunity they get, the more eager they become to help their community. For example, when I used to go to primary school, we had a chance to visit a nursing home and help elderlies with their daily routine.

To cut a very long story short, the aforementioned points and examples have made it clear that I disagree the statement. First of all, both ~~technology-technological~~ developments and the educational system have made it easier for kids to increase their knowledge about serving community. Furthermore, society itself accepts kids as members of this world and lets them joincombine-with others-assistants. It seems like that children's entrance/participation in this area would be increased in upcoming years, which counts as a huge achievement.
