

One of the best ways that parents could help their teenage children prepare for adult life is to encourage them to take a part time job.

In my opinion, having a part-time job for teenagers helps them to grow in a different way than their friends who are in the same age. It's an effective training if parents help teenagers to have a part-time job besides studying in school because of some reasons I support below.

To begin with, by encouraging teenagers to have a part-time job, they will possess more ability to socialize with different types of people with a variety of positions in the workplace. They will ~~lie-~~experience in a various conditions that give them a particular experience. This circumstance brings them more ~~confident~~confidence, and their personality is formed more effectively. So, consequently, it will boost the mental ability to control many unexpected situations. Taking ~~place-part~~ in the community gives them an extraordinary sight about their life, and even the country they live in, it actually may change their line of thought from teenage and help them to make an appropriate decision about their future. I remember my cousin, who took a part-time job when he was a teenager, and then he got familiar with different personalities that led him to gain more experience. So when he became an adult, he was so responsible and took care that everything goes well.

Secondly , having a part-time job as a teenager makes you an independent person in the family, and many of your family members would count on you and consult with you, because they suppose you have the ability to detect the good ~~point~~ and bad points of anything. Presumably, your family intend to borrow some money when they get stuck in a tough situation.

Altogether, ~~take-taking on~~ a job in the teenage period makes teenagers able to lay_out their life goals life in a better direction.
