

Many museums charge for admission while others are free.

Do you think the advantages of charging people for admission to museum outweigh the disadvantages?

Museums are a symbol of culture, history and artistic or even scientific aspects of each nation. Recently, there has been lots of controversy as to whether visiting the places ~~where~~ which maintain the archives of national heritage of every country should be paid, since it is considered for some major museums that in spite of its benefits may involve ~~s~~ a few demerits.

Several museums all over the world are free to not ~~discouraging~~ discourage people visiting them who ordinarily prefer to not pay in this way. Also, everyone should have access to such important resources like other educational opportunities. Although governments must allocate funds for these service programs, unfortunately they are not as sufficient as should be, so museums' ideal quality of function and other public services would not be guarantee forever due to the limited budget.

Additionally, these recreational places could be efficient while interested people or tourists are attracted to visit them because of popularity in their facilities, design or presenting valuable objects. Advertising to persuade people to boost their basic information as well as aesthetic fields requires plenty of costs. Moreover, the social and welfare services should be provided adequately for educated individuals to promote their research when they want to employ documentary collections. Therefore, an admission charge regardless of losing a few people could create a better chance of quality and development in every museum. For instance, the official part of each museum could hold various exhibitions per season to convince people to attend ~~ing-in~~ cultural centers as much as other active citizens, so an entry fee could support offset the initial expenses of launching these programs.

In conclusion, museums which receive a reasonable charge ~~with an acceptable figures~~ not only could increase their audiences by improving their productivity but also open up ~~the~~ exciting opportunities for people who become enthralled to follow their activities.