

In the past, people wore their traditional clothes and followed their culture. These days, most people wear similar clothes and therefore look very similar to one another. Do you think this is a positive or a negative development?

In this fast-paced world people's perspective on the type of clothing and their appearance has changed due to the enormous development in their lifestyle, although the value of the age-old clothes which are associated with a person's roots cannot be denied.

Generally, traditional clothes are known as a symbol of each nation's culture and identity. Wearing them usually brings a sense of national pride to every person to introduce his/her heritage or the story behind them. Moreover, a handful of people opting to use their classic dress not only have maintained the global diversity, but also preserved their historical traditions. For instance, in Iran, most of the people living in villages, who have continued to wear their traditional dresses and performed their ancient ceremonies, have piqued affected others' interests to participate in these customs which can contribute to being acquainted with their cultural legacy.

However, since a great number of individuals have been influenced by fashion trends, they are willing to follow them to be more classy, stylish and also attractive in-on various occasions which are completely different with the past. Also, it is believed that national clothes make people, particularly youngsters, feel more confident because they are portraying a modern image of themselves as well as rising-raising a sense of unity instead of thinking about divergence. On the other hand, manufacturing ordinary clothes has promoted lucrative markets potentially as a result of being produced faster and more affordably than traditional clothing that most of them are hand-crafted with costly fabrics such as Indian Sari.

In conclusion, the positive results of wearing similar and contemporary clothes outweigh the drawbacks because people's lifestyle and attitude have adapted to novel and modern times as well as their style of clothing, although they should be persuaded to follow and respect their customary dress which can be a way to be attached to their ancestors.
