

Some people take the view that older children can take care of younger children, some others may hold the view that taking care of children should be done by other adults. Which view do you agree with? Why?

Children bring joy and happiness, but it is only possible through the special care they receive in a nurturing environment. As older children can be a perfect partner in playing games with their younger siblings or relatives, they may also be considered a perfect option for taking care of them. While some believe that older children can look after younger ones, I think that the whole responsibility should be on fully grown adults because of their physical abilities, maturity and legal duties.

First of all, taking care of a child is not only limited to spending some time with them, but also requires one's physical strength. For example, as danger is always threatening young children, leaving them alone while playing has never been a good idea. Prevention of the incidence of Happening an accident while playing necessitates measures to be taken. If a child breaks his/her hand, a person who is physically strong is needed to grab and hold them while taking them to the hospital. Besides, as children cry because of various reasons, for some of them, hugging remains the only option to calm them down. Therefore, the more an adult is physically powerful, the better reaction they show in vital situations.

Moreover, maturity comes with age. As children grow, their needs differ from time to time. This can burden a huge responsibility on caregivers. The more adults are knowledgeable about a child's demands for a healthier life, the better capable they ~~capable~~ are in-of managing upcoming challenges. Furthermore, taking care of children is not limited to their basic needs, which demands well-~~spend~~ spent time playing with them and helping them to develop mentally. Sometimes children may engage in a fight, so only a sensible adult can handle the situation while teaching problem-solving skills. As a consequence, not only is the physical presence of an adult ~~is~~ not enough, but also their intellectual abilities are vital so that children's mental health would be guaranteed.

Finally, each society has defined some principles to boost children's quality of life. Law establishments are provided in the case of negligence by caregivers or other legal guardians. For instance, in the case that older children are given the responsibility to take care of their younger siblings, every incident that threatens their safety can lead to adverse consequences such as legal punishment for parents or other main caregivers. As a result, the more rules are set strictly in the case of child caregiving, the more adults may take them seriously and the probability of such happenings will decrease.

To sum up, I believe that adults should hold the responsibility of taking care of children. I suggest that policy makers relax the rules, giving more off time to their employees when it comes to taking care of children, because in this way adults show instant reactions in times of need, children develop mental skills and the chances for accidents decrease.
