

Some parents offer their school-age children money for each high grade they get in school. Agree or disagree?

It is a controversial question whether to encourage our children with money to get good marks in school or not. Some parents firmly oppose this idea because they think that their children ought to study their lessons ~~spontaneously~~of their own accord. Nevertheless, I personally believe that it is an outstanding idea because of three reasons.

At the beginning of this, I speculate it is an appropriate approach because reinforcements like money have an important impact on the learning procedure of our children. If we offer them money we will prompt them to love studying their lessons and science more and more. I can illustrate it with a real example. My father always gave me some money if I ~~have been acquiring~~acquired impressing success. Thereby he constantly ~~has been inducing~~induced me to be innovative and ~~be~~ a conscientious student.

Secondly, money gives children a sense of control and they will attain self-confidence. They can prove themselves by doing work like studying. In the future, they will have more self-esteem and will have this belief that if they endeavor hard they will reach the zenith of their profession.

Eventually, If children love books they will spend their money for scientific purposes. So, if we give them more money they can have more access to vast knowledge by buying books.

In ~~the~~ conclusion, we can say that not only is offering money to children ~~is~~ not harmful to them, But rather~~also~~ it can help them to prosper in their academic goals.
