

It is generally believed that some people are born with certain talents, for instance for sport or music, and others are not. However, it is sometimes claimed that any child can be taught to become a good sports person or musician.

Discuss both these views and give your own opinion.

Nature/nurture

In this day and age, it has been a common practice for plenty of children to be in keen competition so as to excel at specific skills, so the importance of innate talent or efficient training is the main issue for most of the parents and teachers which should be analyzed carefully since it will affect the individuals' future life considerably. The question of which one takes priority is a serious concern for many....

First and foremost, I opine that the attitude-approach of education systems towards pupils' abilities has been fortunately upgraded all over the world during recent years, particularly in developed countries. In other words, they believe most of the students have competence of acquiring new skills and techniques in a variety of fields to get professional through quality training and hard work irrespective of natural aptitude. In addition, teachers and parents have much of a role to play in giving positive reinforcement to children in order to put their every effort into boosting such skills. Therefore, in terms of success, not only can children be trained well to achieve their goals but also they may outperform their counterparts who are merely genuinely talented.

However, some groups of people argue that becoming professional in a various array of specializations is inextricably bound up in innate talent of individuals. Their firm conviction is that only when everyone has natural talent and aptitude, will they be quite successful in their professions. In fact, this factor drives them dramatically and leads to paving the path to enhance their ability which in turn brings about outstanding features, so this essential factor cannot be denied.

By and large, from my standpoint, interest is another major factor by which everybody will become motivated so as to succeed in each field. Therefore, even though the mentioned items meaning effective training and natural talent positively affect the children's prosperity, I strongly believe instinctive/intrinsic interest is the main reason why individuals become master at their specialization faster because it inspires them significantly. Therefore, recognition of children's own strengths and fostering them is-are a vital factor which should be fulfilled carefully at schools and in immediate family. Last but not least, most of the successful people are hard-working ones, although even without specific natural aptitude, so this phenomenon has a crucial role in this regard.

Consequently, further to the above explanation, all the mentioned factors have their own effects in succeeding and they should be applied along with each other to provide the best productivity and outcome of individuals. As a result, in my opinion, the role of both training and hard work generally outweighs that of the innate talent.