

Countries are becoming more and more similar because people are able to buy the same products anywhere in the world. Do you think this is positive or negative development?

There is the notion when similar products spread around the world countries are becoming similar to each other. I completely believe this development can have detrimental effects on the countries' economy and culture.

To begin with, the history and culture of every country can be seen in artifacts that have been manufactured in that country. If international products advance relentlessly into every country around the World, they are more likely to one day oust the traditional objects of every nation, which not only would ~~they lead to lose~~ losing the diversity around the World, but also ~~they lose~~ the identity of any nation. Take Iranian copper ~~utensils-crockery~~ as an example; these dishes are part of the Iranian culture that are not similar to any other dish.

On the other hand, the spread of multinational products can cause ~~lossto lose~~ of many jobs. It means, many factories which produce traditional products like food, utensils, clothes, and accessories and create a wide range of employment for local people, cannot work as before. Moreover, the tourism industry may be affected. ~~Because~~ because tourists ~~do~~ are not impelled to buy goods which are the same everywhere so it could harm the local economy. For example, there are many small areas ~~that whose~~ their economy relates to goods they sell to tourists or export to other countries.

That/who my/his/her/their

I have a friend ~~who his /that his~~ whose daughter drinks water before eftar.

To conclude, from my point of view, having access to the same products can have a detrimental influence on specially the local economy because local people lose their jobs. Besides, it can bring ~~a~~ uniformity around the World.