

To solve present and future problems, it is necessary to understand the past. Agree or disagree?

Hardly ever can anyone call into question the significant role of history in people's life. The question arises as to whether knowing past events can be effective on fixing future issues or not. I wholeheartedly adhere to this belief that being aware of the past can be beneficial for solving future dilemmas for some main reasons which I will explain at length in the subsequent paragraphs.

To begin with, as the saying goes" History is a mirror of lessons" which people should learn from. In other words, by knowing the past events, mistakes will not repeated, so basically some problems will not be emerged which require to be being solved. From my own experience, I have allergic allergy to eggplants and Betamethasone since they cause closing (closing) my airway, so when doctors prescribing medicine to me or I order food from restaurants, they ask me that if I have allergic allergy to specific objects or not. In my opinion this is a kind of understanding the past which prevents the irrecoverable damage in the future which indicates it is important. Therefore, it goes without saying that being aware of what happened at in the past not only can be practical for solving future issues but also it can be a barrier for to repetitive previous failures.

Another aspect which I should point out is about evaluating. In apposite words, fundamentally by understanding a past issue the weaknesses and strengthen will be sized up which is conducive to finding new ways to solve. I mean for fixing current problems it should figure out novel ways to solve them regardless instead of previous ones that have remained fruitless. In simple terms, if the problem was solved, it would not be an issue anymore. The best example is, the better therapies for HIV which have has recently been discovered at University of Maryland, Baltimore countrycounty in-on April 23, 2020 due to researchers' efforts for many years, thereby utilizing of information they had obtained from the past to the present can achieve that end. Hence as is clear, knowing the past can be efficient for finding new ways to solve current and future problems.

Last but not least, although some people believe that for fixing problems it is not essential to figure out the past, I strongly believe otherwise maintaining that this mindset is nothing but a tunnel-vision which overlooks the striking point of the abovementioned facts. I believe the advantages of being aware of the past to clear up dilemmas greatly outweigh the drawbacks.

In conclusion, ~~in~~on the basis of the reasons ~~which were~~ mentioned above, I totally agree that understanding the past can have positive effect on solving problems.
