What do you think are the causes of this?

What solutions can you suggest?

Working while studying is becoming very common these days and many are questioning this activity since the attention to and focus on what may constitute their future is-are diminishing. Usually, a great deal of stress is followed by this due to the shortage of time and struggle of mind.

Initially what causes a person to work is obviously financial needs. Although there are many who don't work for the need of money, one can say they are not quite affiliated with their studying major and therefore they pursue their business dreams. These days people follow academic courses because they feel that having academic certificates or degrees is a must in this era and ergo they step-set foot in where they don't like to be and work where they feel comfortable. Even though a debate rises which indicates that many are neither working in their favorite workplace nor studying what they like, we should always consider some exceptions. So, it is fair to say the main reasons causing one to work while they-are studying is either financial reasons or lack of interest in their major in university or college.

A great number of people are working in a field which is related to their education and there are many who claim this is a reasonable path to go through because they are experiencing what they are learning theoretically and this boosts their skills in the future. Finding a related occupation to your education field is often challenging and it takes a lot of effort but it is worth trying if you insist to-on working while you are in universities. It is impossible for clinical sciences to experience the theories until graduation and because of the expensive tuitions in universities, people who are in need of money find themselves-selves in worst of situations. In this case nothing but financial aids of the government is useful. Governments should employ a method to loan money to students and start their paybacks after they are-have graduated. This way they have their most attention on-to their study and can worry about money later when they are working and earning some money.
