

Some people say that it is possible to tell a lot about a person's culture and character from their choice of clothes.

Do you agree or disagree?

There is a view that ~~says-states/posits/suggests~~ culture and personality would be noticeable when a person chooses what to wear. While there are many barriers ~~on-in~~ the way of making a real choice, in my opinion it works in general.

People sometimes cannot wear what they really want because of some reasons and this is why we cannot find out their real choices and consequently real personality. At first it might be related to the rules about clothing that are different in each country and society or even some educational and official locations. For example, in some of these places our clothes must be a bit more modest or some kind of clothes such as the scarf is necessary to wear in some countries. According to this issue each person may ~~perform-appear~~ in a different way in any of these locations. Secondly financial issues can directly impact on our clothing, as an instance when some problems such as inflation impose a lot of changes on the market~~ing~~ and the public purchasing power we cannot have what we desire/anything we want/prefer.

Despite the effects of the mentioned factors, some other possibilities exist by which we can ~~make-pick~~ a real option and wear what we really ~~want-are keen on~~ and what is more consistent with our personality. For example we can still select from that modest attires or if there are financial problems, we can go for some solutions such as economical fabrics and tailors or look for discount timetables. Nevertheless, these solutions cannot be entirely effective or useful, so that finding out the characteristics and cultural information from someone's clothing is not accurate.

To sum up, although we cannot thoroughly discover the personality of people based on/by their clothes, I believe that it can be a sign that gives some little general information about them.