

It is better for children to choose jobs that are similar to their parent's job than to choose jobs that are very different from their parent's job. Do you agree or disagree?

It is crystal clear that choosing an occupation plays a paramount role in people's life but whether pursuing family's work can be beneficial for them especially for children or not. Even though choosing careers which correspond with parents' work has some advantages, I wholeheartedly adhere to this belief that children by following different jobs from (besides) their family's work can gain more benefits for some main reasons which I will explain at length in the subsequent paragraphs.

To begin with, there is a ~~gap~~-generation gap between parents and their children, so nowadays maybe parents' jobs are no longer efficient. In other words, applying for an occupation which is dysfunctional is not a sophisticated choice since there is no market available for it. The best example is, in my country there are some old-fashioned (ancient)/long-lasting jobs such as embroidering quilts which is not a trending ing career anymore due to the lacking number of customers, thus if a person's job is similar to that of his parents', it would not be successful. Therefore, it goes without saying that some careers will become obsolete over time, so choosing them based on their similarity (as being similar) to their family's occupation would not be a wise decision.

Secondly, by going for a job which is different from that of their parents' not only can children gain various experiences but also their confidence will be raised. In apposite words, fundamentally when children are working for a job which is not similar to their parents' occupation, they would face some challenges which have to be ~~rectify~~-rectified by on their own, so this fact can increase their confidence. For instance, my family's business is trading but I did not follow this job, so I started to run my own business which is sewing. Although I have many hitches-challenges with my career that my parents cannot help me with, I am proud of myself/I pride myself on my job and my confidence has increased owing to the fact that I was able to start my own occupation and coping with it without my family's help (helping). Hence, as is clear choosing different work from parents' job by children increases their experiences which contribute to self-creationself-sufficient. cutie X3, you pride yourself on your beauty

To recap, on the basis of the reasons (which were) mentioned above, in my view applying for jobs which is-are not similar to parents' work can be more practical for children based on being efficiently and gaining experiences which is conducive to raising their confidence.
