

It is often said that retirement is the happiest time of a person's life.

How far do you agree with this view?

There is a big controversy surrounding the issue that employers would-will have a delighted moment when they are retired. I suppose it could be correct provided that after retirement they have a suitable physical and financial condition otherwise I believe that they might be faced with some difficulties.

It would be fair to say the majority of people, on the one hand, could enjoy their life after they be-are retired. The most obvious reason could be that they have more leisure and hang out more with their families, relatives, and best buddies. Such pleasure time might provide them with the chance to live longer and would enhance their life expectancy and keep them in an appropriate healthy state in-terms-of physically and emotionally. This condition, in the long run results in senior citizens in societies feeling ing a safe and comfortable moodmode.

Some people, however, claim that the emeritus population might not have a stable state after they leave their work. This would mean that their situations whether they could be happy or not is contingent on their financial conditions and the amount of pension that they will receive from the government. This might be problematic for a simple reason because the elderly might receive an inadequate stipend and the governments would not pay them adequate bonuses and perks after they get retired, although those-they should consider saving money for their rainy day. With the aforesaid explanation, hence, pleasure time after retirement would have an inextricable correlation with fortune and healthy.

Overall, from my point of view retired people could have a decent life when they consider all factors which might be encountered after they get retired such factors could be saving enough money for traveling with their families and curing themselves when they get sick. I, also suppose that it is incumbent on the governments to create a decent living situation for their retired citizens.
