

Many governments think that economic progress is their most important goal. Some people, however, think that other types of progress are equally important for a country.

Discuss both these views and give your own opinion.

A plethora of people subscribe to the view that the economy is the most essential component for being a successful country, whereas others suppose that there are a majority of developments that should occur ~~/be done~~; they are equivalent to economic advancement. ~~A the~~ question that arises is whether a varied range of progress is inseparable for a nation.

Admittedly, in terms of wealth, the growth in the economy plays a crucial role, which means that if a recession happens in a region, it will likely be that its citizens encounter numerous issues which may lead to poverty, ~~unsafe-insecurity~~ and even death. To exemplify, several developing countries having economic instability frequently suffer from various matters. Therefore, the importance of economic growth could not be underestimated as a central part of society. Secondly, when the economy is growing, the level of satisfaction increases drastically, and it could result in life expectancy rising/going up. America is a tangible example of a wealthy country in which all economic factors meet all criteria.

There are, however, a number of fundamental matters that governments should consider in their minds without which economic progress is pale significantly. The first and foremost is the education system of a country. In other words, not only does it raise mindful and skilled youths but also could teach pupils how to easily express themselves, their ideas and defend them. Education is a decisive factor in the technological and psychological progress of the future. The other issue is ~~that~~ human rights, because if a country would like to achieve success, it is vital to provide basic rights for all of its citizens.

In conclusion, although ~~economy-economic~~ growth at first sight seems to be the eventual goal for all countries, there are other types of developments that should be met ~~that-whichthey~~ are as absolutely crucial as economy. In my view, all of the components are equally important for society.
