

To what extent has the internet made life more convenient? Reason, experience and example

There is little room for doubt that most houses have at least one computer and mobile device which have been equipped with constant access to the Internet. With such access /Internet access, people can perform many tasks at home and let their fingers do the walking on account of such accessibility accessible to the world, so people with a wide range of ages and careers can benefit from this useful achievement application. This essay explores several subtle reasons why the Internet could be taken into account as (as?) a facility that has made our lives convenient.

At first glance, the internet seems to have huge advantages s for the youth. Certainly, they can do school and university work more productively ly and keep in touch with their friends who m especially are far from them due to a trip or emigration. To illustrate, they share their interests and knowledge with each other through out the internet. To put it another way, young people are able to cope with their problems simply in this way. However, It should be noted that there it is likely to be inappropriate information, e.g. violent or adult sites, but there are filters and controls that parents can use to control access to these.

What's more, this technology has dramatically reshaped the nature of some tasks including grocery shopping and banking issues. Companies already present their products, their services on the Internet and so they get more flexible. For instance, products are looked for through towards the relevant websites. Besides, that, nowadays, banking through the internet as a strategic resource for achieving higher efficiency, control of operations and reduction of costs by replacing paper-based and labor-intensive methods leading to higher profitability.

Finally, using the internet might seem like a good solution for someone who is shy and worried about meeting others. ironically, it is more likely to keep them at home. If people didn't have this option they would have to go out and meet real friends, which is more a healthier way to deal with being lonely/solitude/loneliness.

In conclusion, the Internet access has changed man's lifestyle. As a matter of fact, apart from some drawbacks which are brought along bring with any technology, its pros outweigh overweight its cons. undeniably it helps people communicate and perform/do tasks easier than the past. Actually, people are increasingly reliant on this technology to complete every day activity.