

Some people think that parents should teach children how to be good members of society. Others, however believe that school is the place to learn this.

Discuss both these views and give your own opinions.

With the progress of psychology in the last several decades, psychologists assert that children's rearing begins even before their births. Consequently, schools do not seem to be the only places which where have shaped children's personality.

Some maintain that after going to the school, children spend a lot of time with their peers and teachers who have an enormous influence on them, whereas the most parents have to devote their energy and time to cover the expenses of their families and most of the time do not have enough time for this extremely huge burden.

Therefore, it is schools' duty to educate our children how to play their social role in an amore acceptable way.

However, others say that parents play a pivotal role in shaping their child's behavior because children learn the most of their manners while they are infants or and toddlers, hence parents should be prepared for this responsibility. Even though they are busy, they should reduce their working hours and assign this free time to their children.

In my opinion, although schools and parents have a massive responsibility for child raising, parents' role is more important because children have more ability to learn at an early age before going to school. At these ages, toddlers follow their parents and statistics show that this particular period of time determines their social role and personality in the future.

To sum up, there should be develop a close cooperation developed between parents and schools so that our children enjoy a favorable learning atmosphere to turn into more honorable and respectable individuals.