

Nowadays many countries have very cosmopolitan cities with people from all over the world. How can the government ensure that all these people can live together harmoniously?

One of the most prominent trends in the 21st century is a closer connection between countries that contributes to higher percentages of immigrants. That is to say, people travel more now than they used to. Ultimately society is under obligation to incorporate all cultures. This issue should be viewed and analyzed from multiple perspectives.

Firstly, all governments insist that school and university put some courses in their curriculum including history and traditions of other countries, not just the home nation. This can be an effective way for students to broaden their minds and ideas. By learning how others have lived, they can gain insight into alternative cultures and help all of the students, whether immigrant or native, them to behave treat in a better way while being exposed to exposing people from traditions.

Furthermore, the host government should offer amenities such as free language and culture lessons. New comers -comers can integrate even if provided that they cannot don't understand the new habits and language of their new home. By acquiring this erudition, they will cope with this issue without losing their own identity.

Finally, the government ought to enact some criteria and strict laws to protect people from not only aggression but prejudice. However, it can also be beneficial for society to promote integration.

As outlined above, increased interaction between countries causes a cosmopolitan atmosphere. Barely does conflict between cultures happen in the host country as if all people had the same culture. In other words, laws and understanding people play a great role in this trend.
