

Some people think that the teenage years are the happiest time of most people's lives. Others think that adult life brings more happiness, in spite of greater responsibilities.

Discuss both these views and give your own opinion.

Human life is comprised of several periods beginning with infancy and ending in old ages. The question as to fact that which period brings us the most pleasure can be a slightly difficult, although it is often said that it is surely between teenage years and adulthood.

Some maintain that teenagers do not undertake any serious responsibility and spend most of their time watching TV, playing, outings with their peers in general, every action giving them gladness. Following fashion is their primary concern and as if they live in a the different world with no limitations. They do not care about global crises like wars or global warming and the only obligation which they feel is going to school and studying.

Others assert that although adults have to earn money and deal with a lot of difficulties like probably paying various installments or covering the expenses of their family, we cannot deny that they can experience new roles like parenthood, particularly being a mother for females, being a spouse or reaching financial independence, in which case they can decide for their life on their own. Moreover, in these ages, they have chances to opt for their future occupation and fulfill their ambitions, especially for men, to turn into a future president or a successful employer with many employees.

To sum up, it is true that we are given the possibility of trying new experiences with no serious concern, but I prefer adult life because in this case, you are able to be independent and choose your way on your own.
