There is a rising number of people who believes that we must not derive benefits from of animals and they have their rights like humans and this is a justice, but some people unkindly argue that animals are not the same as humans and do not have haven't any rights in human society and we must use them to meet overcome our necessities.

For thousands of years, human-kinds lived with types of animals and basically animals always were an important part of their life and were respectable for people because of their benefits. It's not an-ethically accepted issue that we use these important parts of our life as an apathetic thing. Animals are a valuable worthful piece/part of our life and we must respect them.

Apart from physical benefits of animals in to providing foods and testing new drugs, some of them help us mentally. A recently research shows that living with pets has enormous health benefits to us, especially for those who have lost a loved one. Some scientists are working on using animals like dogs or mice mouse-to diagnose cancers in humans's body before it can be realized by medical instruments, then how we can think of to exploiting them?

Furthermore, we can provide a balance between our ambitions and our environment to have a better world in the vicinity of other creatures to have a healthy world both mentally and physically. The more respect to our environment, the fewer less problems we have.

Consequently, paying more attention to animals around us as a piece/part of our environment has multiple benefits for us and an acceptable right for them is undeniable.
