

Does travel help to promote understanding and communication between countries?

Every year a new rash of enthusiastic people go on a journey to other countries either for business or ~~either for~~ leisure. The tourism experts cite ~~the a~~ a couple of major contributors to this phenomenon from Cheap and safe Transportation to the internet and mass media development. Whatever the causes are, I would like to focus more on one of the most prominent effects of going on an international trip, namely reciprocating and mutual insight between countries.

First and foremost, for most, some consider tourists ~~as~~ the potential cultural ambassadors. no matter how long your trip lasts, you have to interact with locals and this leads to sharing what we know as the social experience. For instance you would like to buy a handy handicraft as a souvenir, certainly you will need to know more about the cultural features of your purchase to make it more sensible and as you have access to local people, it does make sense (and I personally believe is the most reliable way) to receive information about your hypothetical handmade commodity from them. Moreover, you will learn how people from other countries reach out a deal or bargain for it.

Secondly, economists maintain that tourism creates financial bonds between the host countries and their guests, resulting in implementation of rewarding business relationships between both sides. In ~~the~~ other words tourism triggers economic incentives motives and it convinces people to put much more effort into knowing each other, otherwise it would be impossible for them to establish an advancing and enduring commercial cooperation.

To sum up, among all significant and innumerable approaches to of travelling around, it is obvious that strengthening international connections is the most valuable and praised one. it basically prevents nonsense quarrels between nations and in the event of case of occurring an unfortunate conflict they can resolve their issues/differences more effectively due to reciprocal comprehension and frequent relation between people.