

Does travel help to promote understanding and communication between countries?

In this fast-changing world, travelling is more and more facile, thence/hence a large number of people around the world travel for visiting other countries. Therefore, travelling is one of the best ways to enhance understanding and communication among countries.

First of all, when you travel to another country, it seems troublesome to comprehend an unknown culture because it is totally contradistinctive from yours, but it could be fascinating and valuable to realize about different cultures and to learn about the customs and traditions. Moreover, travelling helps you to know other languages. In this way, we can have a better communication with a larger number quantity of people around the world. In the same way as As though, in some countries pupils decide to have a summer trip to England not only for a visit and enjoy the life in the United Kingdom, but also for learning English.

Eventually, travelling is the most effective way to introduce our products to other countries. These products including variant segments like an agricultural, industrial, art, literature literary, music, and Etc. furthermore, we can tell them about our own business and work with those countries on in a bigger scale. However, everything has two sides of the same coin. Under such circumstances To what extent, people swapping their culture during these trips and it causes countries to promote the communication.

To sum up, I think it is to be true that communication and understanding between countries can improve by travelling. In addition, people have a chance to being more familiar with various aspects of life in dealing with various varietal/miscellaneous cultures.
