

As computers are very quick in translating various languages, some people say it is useless now to learn any new foreign language. to what extent do you agree or disagree?

Using various types of translators has been an inevitable part of our technologically modern lifestyle. Whereas some tend to frown upon learning a new language as a result of this ever-growing trend, I strongly concede that having ~~a~~ such an ability would be highly beneficial for various reasons.

That electronic translators could take advantage of their elaborately designed processors in order to translate each world word in less than a second is indisputable. However, they might not be accessible in some places, for example ~~For example~~, in extreme weather conditions such as torrential rains or remote places with no access to electricity or the internet. Despite their magnificent functions, specifically in a few days' holiday ~~holiday~~ they might become extremely useful. What needs to be taken in to ~~into~~ account is that they should be packed and carried with their essential accessories which could be inconvenient. Namely, an adaptor for an online laptop-based dictionary like Google translator or even a set of rechargeable batteries for a digital talking translator gadget.

I personally believe that the process of learning a language could usefully contribute to gaining a precious amount of information about the countries where that language is spoken in that ~~In that~~ not only can learners ~~can~~ get familiar with those countries' cultures and traditions, it would be a brilliant opportunity to start ~~a~~ communicating ~~on~~ with the local people which leads s to friendship and raising trust among nations. What is more, is that for developing an international business, the more dominant a person be in speaking their target country's language, the higher chance succeeding in making deals. Getting familiar with daily used slangs especially among youngsters which are not found in written dictionaries is another great advantage /merit of learning a foreign language. It is widely recommended to learn basic sentences when you decide to spend a few weeks in your destination and then apply yourself to develop it.

In brief, although implementing both online and offline translator devices could be useful ~~beneficiary~~ in case of a vacation or small chat, learning a foreign language is definitely a fun and challenging experience and can be considered a great exercise for our brain's cells.