

It is important for children to learn the difference between right and wrong at an early age. Punishment is necessary to help them learn this distinction.

It isn't important for children to learn the difference between right and wrong at an early age because kids don't have enough knowledge of the world, and their emotions ~~doesn't~~ are not completed as an adult, so I completely disagree with any punishment or even trying to learn these articles-issues at an in early age.

First of all, the children don't have enough knowledge of the world because they are growing up, and they're getting so many basic information of life, so their brain usually doesn't have the ability to learn the difference between right and wrong. For example, when I was six years old, I wanted to be a character in the Batman's movie who is called The Joker. I didn't know anything about stealing and assassination, but I just liked his colorful clothes. Also, my parents couldn't describe the Joker's character as a bad guy for me because there were so many wrong acts that he did on-in the Batman's movie. Therefore, children usually cannot understand the difference between right and wrong without having enough knowledge.

Finally, the children's emotions are not ~~doesn't~~ completed as an adult, so they cannot understand so many important sexual problems that will be caused in the future. When my five-~~years~~-old cousin, Shahab, was in the kindergartens, he usually loved his teachers, and he wanted to be married to them, but he probably ye didn't feel love with anybody, and he just wanted to play as an adult. Also, their parents couldn't display the difference between kids' play and married life clearly, so they just spent their patient practiced patience and saw how their son grew up to be a young man, and the world has learned-taught to him the difference between right and wrong.

In conclusion, it isn't important for children to learn the difference between right and wrong at an early age because kids need to have time to understand step by step, and punishment doesn't help to improve the brain of children fast.