

Today people have mixed views on whether receiving more education is pointless disastrous or useful they need it. I opine that having a high education level which is not related to your job title is very wrong.

It has two reasons. The first former is contradiction. There is no correlation between education and jobs. Furthermore, this gives people unrealistic ambitions with lots of stress. For example, if you have this condition that which you are getting a PhD or a Master's in your major but you are do not able to do any things according to your job, by which I mean you do not find ing the opportunity of a job vacancy. ~~It~~ it is full of challenges dangerous and that position is not useful. On the other hand you must follow the rules of experience. By this I mean, the functional level is more crucial rather than the educational level because you can get much more experience with lots of resolving problems and by happening of this event, you can decide that you want to continue studying yingding, stopping it or changing your major.

The second latter is time. Over-education is waste of time and money. If you cannot make a decision for finding a plan of improvement and because of this reason, I believe that education is not enough by itself whereas integration of education and jobs is are a significant good achievement.

In spite of the problems of over-education, most of countries need a high standard of human resource in order to compete in the world and to be famous.

Putting everything into consideration, not only should we expert-not expect from society, but rather we also should prepare a condition in which people learn to know about their skills and expertise without much more unworthy imitation. To put it simply, not every key is right any key is not for resolving every any problems-resolving and it might even have has bad influence on the morality.
