

Some people believe that unpaid community service should be compulsory part of high school programs (for example working for a charity, improving the neighborhood or teaching sports to younger children)

To what extent do you agree or disagree?

Nowadays, education systems offer some extra activities in terms of unpaid working for different kinds of charity institutions or anything could help society's improvement. Many colleges and high schools offer/provide these unpaid community services optionally, but recently it has been suggested that schools should involve students in such activities as a mandatory programs. In my opinion, this idea could have many advantages some of which I will ~~would~~ describe somein-bellow.

First of all, when a teenager just attends ~~in~~-theoretical courses, he would not be able to feel the real world outside, even though they have been so successful in class and they have got a high GPA. These students need to achieve some social skills which could not be acquired unless by experiencing real situations. These kinds of voluntary jobs would also strengthen their future career resume.

Secondly, adolescence is always accompanied by immature decisions. If society puts these works-tasks on optional courses, then they might not attend. Instead, in best case, they would go home and lie down in front of the television or browse the internet, which could cause many physical disorders, eye issues and backache and mental to name but a few. Furthermore, when they do not spend their spare time on some useful work, they would think of doing /committing some crime to outpour their energy.

As a result, making voluntary activities compulsory in the educational system is not only a good/suitable means to improve personal and social skills of pupils, but also a practical way to prevent them from making dangerous and useless decisions. Therefore, I ~~am~~ strongly agree with it.
