

Although dreaming has always been ~~always~~ a prerequisite of all human advancements over the history, some may question whether it is necessary for everyone to follow a big goal. I am of this opinion that while there are several benefits ~~lie-lying~~ in being ambitious for youngsters, I don't think they must be forced to pursue a particular goal to satisfy others.

Most of the inventions and explorations that have changed our life today were initially just a dream in someone's mind. Only when people start to think big and differently, ~~would~~ does it lead to a new discovery. Ambition is particularly important for younger people since they have a longer prospect ahead for progress which in turn ~~emerges~~ creates more opportunities to turn their wishes into reality by working hard. It also gives them enough motivations ~~s~~ to keep continuing to achieve their targets.

On the other hand, some argue that everyone is free to choose ~~his~~ their unique purpose of life. Not everyone has to follow a highly significant goal or make a widespread considerable change for the whole society. Some individuals may find their ultimate happiness in leading a simple life without any beyond imagination achievements. For instance, it is irrefutable that a housewife mother who takes care of her kids in the best way and does her best to raise them as responsible and fruitful members of ~~the~~ society is also a hero, though her name is never written in any book or record.

In conclusion, I believe that even though societies ~~are~~ have always benefited from people who try to be creative and ambitious, it is not necessary for everyone to follow the same path and each person should find her own specific reason to be happy.
