

In some countries today, there is an attitude that 'anyone can do it' in the arts-music, literature, acting, art, etc. As a result, people with no talent become rich and famous and genuine talent is not valued or appreciated.

Do you agree or disagree?

Note: Purple words mean I am not sure which one is correct, or whether it is correct or not.

First of all, the attitude that 'anyone can do it' is such a valuable progress in human society. I have to disagree with the given statement about the devaluation of genuine talented people.

Everyone is considered talented, whether ~~is~~ talented-born or ~~well talented~~-trained. There are many types of talent in various fields such as music, art, ~~and~~ acting, ~~etc.~~ In fact, the chances that you would watch non-talented people who perform as an actor/actress in ~~the a~~ television show are not that high ~~because~~ ~~Because~~ they are demanded to perform ~~their best maximum~~ to increase the quality of the show, yet there are few talent~~less-less~~ people ~~which-~~ ~~who~~ are hired by using connection or quota. On the other hand, in some fields like singing, performers are required to have the talent of singing, so even ~~thought-though~~ they would get hired with the help of others, the chances that they may lose followers sooner or later are high since they have lack of capabilities, hence their fame would disappear soon. /hence disappearance of their fame

In my opinion, the fact that today's people are able to learn tons of skills without any great effort on the Internet is such a ~~breakthrough~~ ~~technology~~ in the last decades. Now they can surf the websites and acquire enormous e-learning archives of their respective area of interest, but it does not always lead to becoming prominent. The competition between ~~the~~ general public who share their talents online is excessive. We can take YouTube artists as an example, they would be famous for months and disappear soon because they have got no adequate potential.

To conclude, ~~the~~ popularity and wealth are achievable, hence ~~as-the~~ more you persevere, the more money you are paid and ~~the~~ more famous you become. I believe people with talent have always been appreciated, ~~mostly~~ in the developed countries. I must insist there is no way that people with definitely no talent would ~~surpass/get a head of~~ those who have ~~divine/natural~~ talent so, you should have adequate skills in order to ~~be/get~~ recognized.
