

Every year several languages die out. Some people think that this is not important because life will be easier if there are fewer languages in the world.

To what extent do you agree or disagree with this opinion?

In today's world, due to the rise in globalization several languages are doomed to extinction annually. In this regard the question of whether this change is a crucial concern or not has emerged as one of the most controversial issues. Some people argue that not only is it not a problem, but also it can help have eing easier communication. In this essay, I will explore both the pros and cons of this idea before giving my own opinion.

On the one hand, one group shares the concern that the more uncommon languages we have in the world, the more complicated international relationships we will face. In this aspect, people consider difficult rarely-speaking spoken languages as a barrier for countries ~~(to make)~~ to making an alliance with their other-language age speaking counterparts.

Another point to consider is an obvious fact that the identity of any individual is embedded in the way he/she speaks. In other words, languages are deeply rooted in cultures. Therefore, a language disappearance could gradually lead to related culture elimination, thereby ~~Hence~~ undoubtedly bringing its history into burial.

At last, in my opinion, the main conclusion to be drawn from this discussion is that although having fewer mutually less languages can be more efficient for commuting internationally, people from any origin have the right to fight for their ancestors' history ies. To make my point crystal clear, having a strong cultural background can cause self-confidence for any person. Thus, despite this undeniable language fading, people of any tongue must try their best to preserve their previous valuable customs through some ~~Multilanguage~~ multilanguage data registration which could keep their roots alive.
