Some parents buy their children a large number of toys to play with. What are the advantages and dis advantages for the child of having a large number of toys?

In todays' growing societies, children are typically born with a silver spoon in their mouth, and their parents provide them with a vast number of toys. This practice could act like a twodouble-edged sword, and be both beneficial and harmful for a child's personality as well as repertoiresintelligence.

Firstly, many of children's toys have some helpful and effective items to offer. To illustrate, there are numerous toys which accentuate learning processes in a child's mind, such as puzzles. As well as that, some of these toys could serve as a springboard for a child's feeling of camaraderie and interaction with his peers. That is to say, when they play with the toys such as foosball-table, they master how to get on with their counterparts. By the same token, children's creativity and intelligence would progress through playing with their toys, say lego. These sort of toys are probably thought-provoking and help them to come up with new ideas. Therefore, having a wide variety of toys could make children smarter with better contribution in the society.

On the other hand, psychologists are of the opinion that the drawbacks of buying a large number of toys much outweigh its merits. First of all, they led lead children to be spoiled. It means that the child always expects his parents to purchase whatever he wants, and will take his father and mother for granted. Besides, as parents buy a huge number of toys for their children, this makes them not to put in any effort for their wishes and wills, and this could develop unpleasant habits in them. In another way, the child asks for a toy, and it is his. On account of that, as they grow older, their needs rise with them, and their requests become more and more irrational without any trying for them.

All in all, provision of a large number of toys have has its pros and cons. I, however, think apart from a few bright points, this can do more harm than good, and in long-term period-both parents and children would suffer.
