

Topic: Some countries encourage teenagers to have part-time job and see it as a good thing, while others disagree. Give your opinion and explain both views.

Many juveniles who step in their adolescence want to have a part-time job in order to gain experience and be able to afford some of their costs and they do not care about its relativeness with their own field of work. However, many will not accredit these jobs as a suitable activity for their pastimes. In this essay we will argue both views.

The mentioned work seekers will probably find a place in a café house, or maybe a retail store and so on. If they are lucky, they will find a job on a big corporation related to their current study. Clearly, being involved in a job and getting salary would be outstanding for everybody, especially for them who want to get apart from their parents and start their own personal lives. In Addition, they can test themselves with obstacles and everyday challenges, which would make them become sophisticated and full-grown.

On the other hand, they will have less time to spend on their study. Although they are in their decisive years, they may get much too busy with their work and lose track of their education procedure. Since they usually are involved in a job which is not related to their education, that [job] will distract them and would be harmful. Furthermore, as long as money would be an illusory object for the human kind, youths may be decoyed and get enticed by it, making them drawn in it.

All in all, attending a job for students have its own circumstances. First of all, they should have enough time to spend on their studies and university forces. Secondly, the job should be related to their main field of work, so it can be accounted as a work experience and they can picture a prospect for themselves in it for the future.