

These days, it seems that an increasing number of people are leaving rural areas to live in the city. Discuss some of the effects of rural depopulation (migration from the country to the city) and suggest some ways by which this trend could be reversed.

The issue of tendency of people to live in much more convenient places once again has come under the spotlight. This essay will elaborate the implications of this phenomenon and suggest some ways to halt/decrease it.

The most significant issue regarding rural-urban migration is associated with an increase in the number of cars in cities, to the detriment of inhabitants. It means that individuals should waste enormous amounts of time in a bumper to bumper traffic. In addition, they will suffer from innocent roars in their new environment that could be a pivotal cause of mental diseases. Further and even more importantly, not only do they leave their previous job for instance, as a farmer, but they also need to apply for an a temporary career, hence lack of enough job vacancy.

Only when countrymen are provided with social amenities, would they be convinced to choose their villages as a better living place. What is more, that the main reason of the disaster of unprecedented tendency of individuals to leave their own cities might be distorted policiesy of the government. The more concentration on a deficiency, the greater solution for tackling it. The authorities had better allocate certain amounts of budgets to improvinge the quality of life in rural places. For example, providinge them with a qualified educational system and free health insurance could be a great idea.

On the whole, the leader of each country should pay much more attention to improving the level of life in that his respective undeveloped areasplace, otherwise accelerating urbanization will pose numerous unsolvable/insurmountable difficulties.
