

Some people say that you can learn more about another country by watching television programs than by actually visiting it. How true is this? give reasons

Acquiring knowledge about a variety of countries and their cultures has different ways. The subject of this essay pops the question up whether it is better gaining-to gain information through media or taking trips to places where you have a desire for. Some believe that it is both comfortable and efficient to turn the television on and pick a plethora of knowledge out of a specific region, while others disagree with such a perspective. Lots of people, myself included, maintain that although you can obtain data via both indirectly and via straightforward methods, you can never compare explorations with all you have observed on your own.

On one hand, advocates assert that the most remarkable factor of in acquiring details about cultures out of borders is from a financial point of view. That is to say, you can feel as a tourist might do, by visiting all over the whole world with no expeditions for tickets or hotels; You also have not do not have to be concerned about either whether you are able to get the visa or not. Moreover, the convenience of such passive exploration is quite appealing so long as you lay lie on the couch and go for journeys around the globe, so it is like a gift to stay in your comfort zone and be engaged with the world.

Opponents, however, see the other side of the coin. That being faceding with the real feel of new aspects of foreign communities on your own might make you be mesmerized is a given. The more you travel, the better you will know the sphere. To illustrate more, by taking trips to the countries you have always wished for, you possess the opportunity to communicate with the local people and learn about their cultural habits by letting them to talk about their own stories; Let alone the issue of foods that you can never taste the indigenous ones by your imagination but by taking them in. Therefore, by visiting overseas you would live the moments you rarely have had the chance for.

To put in a nutshell, the issue mentioned above cuts both ways. Although television or any kind of media has a significant role to make in making us to be far more familiar with cultures other than that of ours, you would never be able to perceive the original atmosphere surrounding by the place in front of the monitor, except your presence within that specific area. Not only is every trip a new leaf of life, but also it makes us to learn how to comply with the arduous situations you come across.
