Some people think that children should start sooner while others believe they should not start before the age of seven.

Although children usually start their education when they are seven years old in most countries, some believe that they should be taught sooner than that. From my point of view, it is debatable issue, and we should consider children's talent, morale and much more besides.

The former group claim that children should not be subjected to rigorous training until seven years old, because they are not old enough to easily adapt themselves to new circumstances. Many a child give up studying/ educating due to their teachers' excessive discipline. I strongly believe that children should not have any serious responsibility for educational concepts. Moreover, parents must allow children to live happy during their childhood. In other words, children should be exposed to free information flow, so that they indicate both their interest and talent. Simply put, with the aid of special training, school principals and parents could raise a successful generation in terms of ethical and educationally.

On the other hand, early starts tend to get advantage in most of their lives' scenarios, hence their successful achievements in comparison with their peers. First and foremost, they learn to make friends in their class and are likely to grasp the concept of sharing at a young age. For example, when they meet their classmates in a class, they play various games and also share their food, so this build the spirit of teamwork. Only when they join school in their young age, is it possible. Last but not least, it is much too easy and also lasting for children to acquire various qualities such as discipline, leadership and cooperation in spite of their young age.

In conclusion, the sooner they take part in peer groups, the more adaptable people we have in their adulthood, but we should consider their other interest to bring happiness for them.
