

Living in a country where you have to speak a foreign language can cause serious problems, as well as practical problems.

To what extent do you agree or disagree with this statement?

Globalization has substantially affected both positively and negatively many aspects of people's lifestyles, and not having common language among the public living in one city is one of those drawbacks. This essay is going to discuss this issue in more detail.

On the on hand, verbal communication is crucial not only in speaking and transferring what exists in your mind, but also in expressing your feelings and emotions. It is obvious that, public relation is not only based on oral conversations but more importantly on the feelings include but not limited to passion, jealousy, anger and frustration. Sometimes a migrant reaches the point where states that if I knew that I could not properly talk with others and cope daily affairs, I would not migrate to this country. Although nowadays there are lots of devices which can facilitate communication among people, face-to-face and direct connection with others still remain necessarily a must.

On the contrary, in spite of the aforementioned issue, growing comprehension in society about the fact that some may suffer from this social problem, have improved the situation for them. Nowadays, many have learned that not only should these guys not be irritated but they also need support. For instance, a few days ago, I saw a man struggling with a taxi driver about the route and the destination, at the very first moments a quarrel seemed to be inevitable, but it turned to be calm due to the attention of the by passers.

Over all, migration is unavoidable and the right understanding about its consequences rose to be more significant. It should be taught to the public how to cope while facing an individual not from the same culture and language, and this could lead us to a better social life.
