

Some people believe that children's leisure activities must be educational, otherwise they are a complete waste of time.

Do you agree or disagree?

How children spend their free time is one of the most important priorities of parents seeking to secure a good future for their children in this rapidly changing world. Some argued that pupils should study most of their times due to obtaining a good career while there are limited opportunities to get hired or land a job in this unfairly competitive era, then it is completely true that young people have to study hard when they are young.

However, older generations who do not allow their children utilize their free time in some physical or mental activities, are in wrong way of creating a bright future. In fact, leisure's activities are a totally basic requirement as much as education. Having played with other same-aged, young people recuperate for amazingly good learning. Moreover, not only do some practical acts refresh young ones' mind, but also improve their physical abilities. One of the best program in order to this issue is the activity planned in the school timetable which always include some periods dedicated to sports. As a result, they are force to get involved in the activities which are required motion resulting in maintaining their fitness level.

In addition, continuously hard educating will probably lead to children facing with some problems. By way of an example, if a student is asked to perform an educational task in his extra time also, there are chances that he might start feelings frustrated with studying.

In conclusion, I deem that an offspring getting engrossed in physical activities in spare interval have much patient to succeed compared to the others who are forced to simply study.
