

Since the start point of school is a milestone, parents are found relatively more sensitive and worried in tackling with the issue. Some might consider it helpful and beneficial to start the school at the early ages while others might prefer to postpone it.

Starting school in an early childhood brings lots of advantages in its wake. Firstly, children have the opportunity to interact with their peers and solve possible problems on their way independently, thereby boosting up their ability of communication and problem solving. Secondly, being challenged with the newly introduced community and situation, children are more socially developed than those who are left at home with their only parents or barely one or two siblings. Besides, The Stanford research brands the valuable advantages of the early school attendance.

Others on the other hand might prone to lag behind the school age of their children. Surprisingly, studies in a university out of Stanford claims that, those parents who waited for an older age benefited more from their children being self-controlled with modulated amount of hyperactivity, it is still not completely proved, though. As an example, opting to postpone the school age is not an uncommon choice in some Nordic countries like Finland which is placed on a top level of education as well, whereas I strongly believe that, only the time could this notion become of value, that parents are provided with enough time to bestow for their children. As it apparent, in our society, parents are fully swamped with the demands of life, so barely could they meet the opportunity to foster their children with optimum development in diverse aspects of their lives, either social or personal ones.

Overall, although there are plenty of positive effects on starting school in younger ages, still some parents are faced with this challenging dilemma as to when to start it. Were I to choose, my definite option would have been the early ages, since the benefits outweigh its downsides, if there might be any.
