The film industry is one of the oldest industries which could adjust itself with the modern technological advances to satisfy its widespread fans across the globe. While many believe that people are gradually losing their attention to the cinema, I arguably claim that this is not the case in general. I believe that by and large people will still go to the cinema enthusiastically. This short essay will elaborate on this heated debate with some personal experiences.

Recent statistics conducted by a group of psychology student show that many people still tend to go to the cinema mainly because of its atmosphere. Tired of the hectic pace of modern life, many a person from different social strata goes to the cinema to communicate with other people having the same taste of artistic works. My grandpa for example prefers to go to the cinema to meet new people, and discuss about the films instead of watching a movie all alone at his luxurious home. Furthermore, I hold the idea that not only does going to the movies have personal benefits, but it is also to the good of society by creating jobs. Many positions involved in transportation, food and security have a close correlation with the usage of playhouses by people.

Having said that, when it comes to a cultural activity specifically during the last decade the silver screen perhaps is not the first choice especially amongst the youth of today. By the advent of the Internet, and media stream applications such as Netflix almost everyone have access to the latest movies on the market, and thanks to the recent advances in home appliances, many families nowadays enjoy watching movies at their private place with their loved ones. Taking advantage of a home theatre system, not only ordinary people but also senior citizens, and those suffering from a kind of physical disability can experience watching a movie at their home with the same features a modern cinema offers.

By way of conclusion, once again I reaffirm that although certain individuals cannot go to the movies owing to their time limitations, but still a majority of population like the silver screen with all their flaws. That still an overwhelming majority of people prefer watching a movie in modern cinemas is an indisputable fact.
