

Some parents think that childcare centers provide the best services for children of pre-school age. Other working parents think that family members such as grandparents will provide better care for their kids.

Discuss both views and give your opinion.

Entering more powerful the world's job market, working mothers have faced some caring issues at the early age of their children. In this regard, a controversial debate has arisen as to whether grandparents are the best choice for taking care of these children or some professional childcare places in contrast, parents must trust professional child care centers for nurturing their kids while they are at work. In this essay, I will elaborate both points of view before giving my own opinion.

On the one hand, some experts are of the opinion that any offspring needs to learn how to socialize with other people in society, which does not come true unless they participate in different peer groups. In other words, communicating with other children, not only can these inexperienced kids learn how to do a teamwork or share their possession, but also they are taught a sort of independency and responsibility by being far from their families. Furthermore, in today's changing world, there are many necessary fundamental skills for children to be learnt, two of which are computer or foreign language lessons. The question is, are the aged grandparents with their old-fashioned knowledge capable of teaching these skills perfectly?

On the other hand, some other people claim that recently, hardly a month goes by without a painful news about children abuse in some inappropriate educational environments. To make my point crystal clear, from this viewpoint, not only are these centers profit-based organization, but also sometimes despite their exorbitant tuition fee, there is no efficient observation on teachers behavior, hence many mental issues in children created from their erroneous manner afterward, either consciously or unconsciously.

To put in a nutshell, although grandparents may not be able to teach all the modern abilities to their beloved grandchildren, at least they put all their effort into taking care of their own flesh and blood as safe as possible. However, some essential required trainings must not be neglected. Thus, were I to choose, I would definitely try to strike a balance between this two methods. To exemplify, children can be sent to kinder gardens under their grandparents' distant observation to be both safe and educated simultaneously.
