

Some people see shopping as a leisure activity mostly for young adults, while others disagree. Do you think this has a positive or negative effect on economic development? Give your opinion and include relevant examples.

People have a variety of ideas about different types of leisure activities, amongst them shopping is assumed to be a constructive choice. Many consider shopping a highly beneficial way to spend spare time that impacts positively both individual and society in various aspects.

Many people believe that shopping could be considered a leisure activity because the shoppers have to visit several shopping centers in various places across the globe. Many only travel to visit luxurious shopping malls in other regions or to buy a specific brand which is not available in their country of origin. As shopping can emotionally satisfy many people, many a person finds it a preferable activity for their pastime. Young female ~~young~~ adults are typical examples who prefer to do shopping rather than any other activity.

Considering shopping a type of pastime benefits both the society and the shopper greatly. One of the most significant points of considering shopping a valid form of spending free time is the financial turnover it can bring about to society. Not only can shopping create jobs for people from all walks of life, but it also can turn the economical wheels to motion. The more request for commodities, the more cash flow in society. The new shopping center near our home I think is a typical example that despite the drawbacks, led to the economic growth in the area. Thanks to the new shopping mall near my area many people are coming to the new center leading to increase the value of properties in the region.

By way of conclusion, I maintain that although, considering shopping has some intrinsic negative points, the advantages outweighs the disadvantages. That spending time for shopping results in prosperity, besides more job vacancies is an undeniable fact, let alone the psychological satisfaction shopping can leads to those who chose shopping to be a way of enjoying their free time.
