Some people believe that unpaid community service should be a compulsory part of high school programmers (for example working for a charity, improving the neighborhood or teaching sports to younger children).
To what extent do you agree or disagree?

In this day and age, fast-paced life is one the main reasons that cause less communication between people in society, so some believe that mandatory unpaid community services should be considered in school curriculum to tackle this problem. In this essay, I will discuss the main benefits of the mentioned action and clear my side.

There are huge advantages behind unpaid community services. First and foremost is related to becoming righteous members of society. If pupils learn how to treat with less fortunate or disabled people during high school, not only will they learn empathetic empathy but also kindness simultaneously. In my opinion, it is much better to consider one day completely per week to spend children's time in charity centers and teach them the proper way of treatment with old or disabled people. They will thank god God to have created them healthy so they can help other people.

There is yet another reason for making social work compulsory. Nowadays children are becoming too full of themselves. They have little time for others. They are glued to their cell phones or played playing video games especially after returning from high school to home. If the charity activities are arranged after regular school programs, they will communicate with other portions of the community and spend their leisure times with them.

In conclusion, from my estimation, preparing children to be a helpful perfect part of society is one of the main goals of training systems and adding unpaid social work as a compulsoryive program in school curriculums helps children to discover their society at an early age.
