

Every country has poor people and every country has different ways of dealing with the poor. What are some of the reasons for world poverty? What can we do to help the poor?

Although poverty has always been a significant challenge for the governments, we face an increasing rate of poverty in a lot of countries. As the reasons are divergent, the solutions differ from political issues like war to social factors such as education.

Each society has varying jobs that due to their role and value in people's life, they are paid. While some jobs given their great effects on life like doctors and lawyers are well-paid, others are not. In addition, the level of education is of highly importance in addressing the poverty insomuch that the more educated, the more money one can earn. In the other words, the jobs that do not need an especial education like factory workers are less-paid. Among other reasons, war, drought and family breakdown can be taken into consideration.

However, to tackle poverty, some beneficial approaches should be adopted. Firstly, free access to basic health care facilities like insurance must be provided as well as public transportation and education. Moreover, the governments should supervise the even distribution of wealth and regulate the market in such a way that the economy functions effectively. It is crystal clear that all the wealth resources need to be allocated to the proper place, not just to the rich. As a result, the governments' intervention is crucial.

In conclusion, not only should all the governments consider poverty one of the most important priorities, but also there should be a world-wide will-power for providing such a standard environment in which (where) nobody endures poverty in their whole life.
