

Some people say that giving an amount of money weekly to children will help them become more capable as they grow older.

Do you agree or disagree?

Although giving an specific amount of money to children at their early age enhances many abilities, it can have some disadvantages. I definitely agree with giving a sum of money each week to children and entrust them with conducting it. I will support my opinion in this essay and the reverse view as well.

To start with, childhood is the formative period of life which should spend on more fundamental training items rather than less important talent which is unneded for children. Moreover, children are not mature enough to find out ~~the~~rights from wrongs and manage their expenses or far beyond that giving the management of pocket money to children might lead to their deviation, to exemplify spend their money for drug, gambling, hence many types of juvenile crimes.

On the other hand, money management is one of the important ability, which youngsters can learn from their childhood through the imposed limitation from their parents on their pocket money. In addition, adolescents learn to consider their necessities' priority, because of their smaller finite budget. To exemplify, someone who wants s to buy a gadget and a story book, can buy the obligatory one and postpone the other, exactly like the future ~~that~~ when they will have a specific amount of salary and should manage their income and dedicate it properly to different expenditures.

To sum up, money management, though arduous, can be given to the children for improvement of this ability besides s the others hence-so that they can be effectively mighty persons s in future. Nevertheless, parents should monitor their behavior for ~~the~~ an outstanding result.
