

Wild animals have no place in the 21st century, and protection programs are a waste of resources.

To what extent do you agree or disagree?

Nowadays, although some might opine that in the twenty first century saving wildlife, wild animals in particular, is a wasted effort, I wholeheartedly believe that not only is it not wastage, but it is also an undeniable responsibility of mankind. The vital impact of these species on our lives entirely punchers the idea as to uselessness of saving wild animals is-useless

First of all, for clues that-as to how wild animals effect-affect our life, the ecosystem balance is an obvious point to start. It literally means both the living things' habitat and their niche, where they live and what their role might be. To find out the idea in depth, consider if no stringent step is taken in order to halt the illegal hunting of carnivores that feed on herbivores, soon they are on the list of extinction. Consequently, the number of the latter, which relies on the forest vegetation to survive, soars to such an extent that they rush on farmlands to obtain food, thereby destroying the crops, ultimately human's life beyond the wildest expectations.

Moreover, seizing the opportunity to treat incurable diseases s such as cancers, Alzheimer's and Parkinson's, plenty of researchers are being conducted- conducting studies upon wild species as well as what they are currently being used. The venom of Cobra, for example is used as a cure for Leprosy. Accordingly, the above-mentioned issue is left on the top priority of humans' responsibilities, especially today when the wildlife is sewn into our fabric everyday life.

In conclusion, I would like to claim that— only when we ensure a check on the life of animals, not just for the sake of wildlife but because of our own selves, could-would we be able to handle the disasters, when it is taking its tolls on our life.
