

The government is responsible for protecting a nation's cultural identity. Thus, some people think it is the duty of the government to ensure that new buildings are built in traditional styles. To what extent do you agree?

Architecture, as an indispensable factor of human beings' history, plays a significant role in men's cultural identity. Therefore, the more emphasis on building applied, the stronger a nation's culture is valued. However, whether should we continue the same traditional constructing- style in-with respect to save the identity of a culture or not is the question.

From my point of view, barely would a sensible person prefer to live in an old fashioned house, though charmed by history, because neither are they convenient nor secure. Having undertaken great changes, building in Japan are much more resilient to earthquakes, thereby saving more lives. Moreover, modern property all set for the perks of our current society whose citizens' lives have been totally changed though decades. No more might an element in homes, which used to be of importance one day, be appropriate, particularly these days that the whole life is surprisingly aided by technology. However, the need for changes in building styles does not debunk the notion of saving the cultural values and meanings, by way of architecture. Thanks to the importance of the sense of belonging, governments are responsible for saving the very valuable old structures, thus transmitting the culture and history to the future generations.

Houses, On the one hand, are to reflect the identity and character of a society admirably evolved over time. On the other hand, they must be able to satisfy all demands of the settlers, so a combination of modernity and history comes into consideration. Besides, historical buildings in any country are shouldering the value of our ancestors, hence they deserve to draw major governmental fund.

Overall, houses must be built in a way that can simultaneously fulfill modern needs as well as respect the responsibility of culture transition , which is indeed vital for any society member.
