

Many ~~graduated graduates pupils~~ from secondary schools choose to spend the year before entering university ~~on~~ travelling abroad or getting a job. In this essay I intend to identify the privileges and demerits of this decision, though I personally believe its advantages are far greater than the negatives.

To begin with, youngsters who do not travel or work in this year off, might not use their time productively and spend it on a spree on streets which might put them ~~in~~at the risk of negative influence of peers/peer pressure. Therefore, travelling to a completely new country ~~in~~ instead, ~~whit~~with quite a different culture and history could not only broaden their prospect-perspective toward life, also they would learn a variety of things from the destination country ( customs, art, language and ~~extetc~~). Traveling, moreover, would probably develop their creativity and discover other aspects of themselves which could be beneficial for their life and work later on. We all have heard that travelling ~~have~~has countless life lessonss in itself which is not ~~a~~ part of any school's curriculum.

Working, similarly, would provide the opportunity to ~~make~~enjoy practical experience and financial independency. Since most of the youngsters after completing high school move out to far away cities ~~in~~ which their university is in, they mostly require to get a part-time job to meet accommodation fees and daily expenses. Thus this year could act as a warm up. Although the sweetness of travelling and earning money might stimulate students to leave studying all together , it is frequently a temporary persuasion.

To conclude, spending ~~the~~a year off before beginning of universities year on travelling and working could assist students in transmitting-transitioning properly from ~~adolescent~~adolescence to maturity.
